

Environmental regulations and increasing fuel costs are driving the electrical industry to seek new solutions for generating more efficient energy. The method of "thermal recycling," or cogeneration, is one answer. Here is a look at the process, based on a Calpine Corp. plant in Pasadena.

1 Gas turbine

A natural gas-powered turbine is similar to a jet engine. This one powers a generator producing 160 megawatts of electricity and produces exhaust gas temperatures from 900° to 1000°.

2 Heat recovery steam generator

Hot gases from the gas turbine are funneled to this multiboyler system to produce steam.

Purified water from a demineralization tank is used to make steam.

Some steam is sold to Phillips Petroleum Co.'s Houston Chemical Complex.

3 Steam turbine

The high pressure steam spins this turbine, producing another 80 megawatts of power.

4 Cooling tower

Similar to a car radiator, it is used to cool and condense steam from the steam turbine. The steam is then recycled back into the heat-recovery steam generator.

5 Main complex

Computerized systems are used to operate the power plant and monitor air emissions. It also houses administrative offices, a warehouse and a mechanical shop.

6 138 kilovolt switchyard/substation

The substation takes power furnished by generators and directs it to lighting and power systems for residential and business use.
