

BILATERAL DIPLOMACY: A PRACTITIONER PERSPECTIVE

Kishan S Rana

Summary

- The bilateral process is the oldest form of diplomacy, dating to ancient times when kingdoms dealt with one another; often, a search for security and trade were the drivers. Covering relations between pairs of countries, this is the building block of multilateral diplomacy.
- It has evolved over time, especially after in the fifteenth-century Italian princely states and dukedoms began the custom in Europe of appointing resident ambassadors. In the seventeenth century, France created an office to manage them; that office became the foreign ministry. Customary diplomatic practices, such as procedures, precedence, and reciprocal privileges, evolved over time, and were codified in the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations (VCDR).¹
- The VCDR defines the tasks of bilateral diplomacy as: representation, protection, negotiation, reporting, and promotion. Each remains relevant but is rendered more complex by the vast and evergrowing agenda in international dialogue (bilateral, regional, and global); the entry of multiple state and non-state actors; and the increasing complexity in international affairs. We examine an alternate definition.
- The four pillars of bilateral diplomacy are: political, economic, and public diplomacy, and consular (plus diaspora) affairs. Its principal institutions are the foreign ministry, embassies and consulates, and the foreign service.
- We consider possible taxonomies for bilateral diplomacy. This is a work in progress; it may inspire deeper research into diplomacy studies.
- Today's diplomatic practices are a consequence of the globalisation of diplomacy, including the revolution in information and communication technology (ICT). Yet the core tasks are unchanged: the application of intelligence to managing relationships with foreign countries across a very broad front in pursuit of the home country's interests. We are in an age of complexified bilateral diplomacy as a result of new actors, issues, and interconnections in international affairs.
- This paper ends with an examination of the major 'tensions', national and international, that challenge effective diplomacy management.
