The Armed Services ● An International Conference on Alienation, Management, and Integration. and Society

The job of the Armed Forces of democratic societies is clear cut: to deter attack, and defeat it should it occur. But if society is sure of the ends, it is less so about the means, and about its attitude to, and the status it accords, its military. For the creation of effective armed forces demands a hierarchical structure limiting that personal liberty of action which is the essence of democracy. This sets the military apart from civil society, leading to alienation, the conception of an elite which may be critical of civil values, and which may sometimes even harbour—as in Algeria, for instance—the seeds of antidemocratic power. Britain has so far rejected conscription as a consequence of this
