

Common Fingering Patterns

Here, the major scale appears in a pattern that moves across the neck on three strings. Notice that the number and name of each note is exactly the same as before.

The fingering used to play the scale is notated in the diagram. This particular pattern is undoubtedly the most common and familiar to bass players. It will be used extensively in this course and will be referred to as "second-finger diatonic" because the second finger of the fretting hand plays the root of the scale (which in this case is a diatonic major scale).

Ex. 2 C major scale, second-finger diatonic

Another fingering pattern for these same notes of C major begins with the fourth finger playing the root note. This fingering will be referred to as "Fourth Finger Diatonic." It contains a shift of fret-hand position (down a fret) to play the last two notes on the G string.

Ex. 3 C major scale, fourth-finger diatonic

By learning these two patterns well, it is possible to find the correct notes for a major scale in any key, as well as the chords that make up a key center. These patterns are the same for five- and six-string bass.

Building the F Major Scale

We use the same interval formula as before to create the F major scale. In the following diagram, the scale is built on one string. This makes it easy to see where the whole and half steps are located. Shifting a pattern (scale) like this, into a new key center, is known as transposing.
