

AN OVERVIEW OF THE DIFFERENT TYPES OF TOXICOLOGY

CHEMICAL TOXICOLOGY

Many other branches of scientific research go into chemical toxicology—like proteomics, metabolism, and molecular epidemiology. An example of research in this field includes the study of the chemical weapon known as Agent Orange used in the Vietnam War and the prolonged effects the chemical had on survivors for years afterward.

FORENSIC TOXICOLOGY

Many people at one time or another have undergone a drug test of some sort—a biological sample can determine the presence of illegal drugs in the person's system. Forensic toxicologists can provide key information about substances in a person's body even after death, which is why their findings and research are key information in many criminal investigations.

REGULATORY TOXICOLOGY

Through the assembly of models and assessments, regulatory toxicologists provide public health information about hazards and risks associated with exposure to chemical agents with the potential to harm the public. Most regulatory toxicologists work in government environmental health and safety, academic, or industrial sectors.

OCCUPATIONAL TOXICOLOGY

An occupational toxicologist will study the potential effects of prolonged exposure to hazardous chemicals on workers who must encounter them regularly at work. A toxicologist in this field may study how inhaling air or ingesting food near these substances may affect workers' health, and they will offer solutions to prevent these adverse effects.
