Report prepared by

Center for Radiation Research,

Gaithersburg, MD 20899

The National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) and the American Nuclear Society jointly sponsored this unique conference to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the discovery of nuclear fission. An international audience of over 400 scientists and engineers joined the distinguished early pioneers to reminisce about the past and to study recent developments of this important technological discovery. The conference highlighted the early pioneers of the nuclear community by dedicating a full day of plenary presentations at the National Academy of Sciences in Washington, DC and later at the conference banquet. More recent developments in fission science and technology in addition to historical

The conference attendees were saddened by the death of Professor Segrè on April 22, 1989, just three days before the start of the conference.

The news was brought to the United States in January of 1939 by Neils Bohr. Within days the discovery was announced in Washington, DC at a conference on theoretical physics at George Washington University. The results were soon repeated at the Department of Terrestrial Magnetism and at other laboratories throughout the nation.

The announcement at the Washington conference made the front page of the January 26, 1939 edition of the Washington Evening Star newspaper under the headline "Power of New Atomic Blast Greatest Achieved on Earth" with the subtitle "Physicists Here Hail Discovery Greatest Since Radium." After an extensive discussion of the physics of the process, the author stated that "the practical uses of the discovery remain vague. It may place hitherto undreamed-of resources in the hands of physicists for experimental purposes and
