

The ballad of Robin Hood and the Monk

The Ballad translated into a story (please see further down for the ballad)

It was Whitsuntide in the Greenwood and the sounds of the forest mingled with scent of a May morning. Robin Hood was in a sombre mood as he stood reflectively gazing into the greenery.

His only thought was that he had not attended matins for a fortnight and he declared to his men that he would go henceforth to Nottingham alone so that he could make his peace with God. He did not heed the advice of Much the Miller's son to take "twelve well armed strong yeomen " with him preferring instead the sole company of Little John.

Alas, Robin was finally captured and thrown into Nottingham prison.

News of Robin's capture travelled back to Sherwood Forest and the outlaws were deeply distressed. Only Little John kept his head and put faith in the power of the Virgin Mary to keep Robin safe. Little John set off with Much the Miller's son and eventually spied the Monk and his page travelling on the road out of Nottingham towards London.

After tricking the Monk who was taking the news of Robin's capture from the Sheriff to the King, Little John and Much killed him and his page and went themselves to London on the Monk's business. The King gave the pair an award and a warrant and sent them back to Nottingham to collect Robin Hood under guard and send him back to London unharmed.

On returning to Nottingham they found the gates shut and the town swarming with guards as the sheriff tried to protect the prize he had locked up in his dungeon. Little John quickly showed the king's warrant and was granted admittance to Nottingham.

On seeing the King's seal, the sheriff was beside himself with joy and drank heavily of fine wine until he fell into a deep slumber. The fate of the Monk was explained by the story that
