

audience, not only of philosophers and psychologists, but of reflective readers generally, for many of the questions posed are not the private property of professionals, but tantalizers and bafflers familiar to the speculations of even the most untheoretical imaginations. If I close my eyes and imagine a purple cow, is something somewhere really purple and cow-shaped? Could a brain scientist someday read my thoughts in my brain? Could a robot be truly conscious? Is free will an illusion? My answers were developed one at a time over the years, but once I finally noticed the rise in my temptation to indulge in the unseemly habit of citing my own work, I decided to succumb totally and admit that I think these essays are truly interrelated and should be read together.

The unified theory I claim to provide here is presented in much the same order as its ancestor was in Content and Consciousness, beginning, in Part I, with basic metaphysical and methodological concerns and then, in Part II, analyzing and defending the—careful-use-of-mentalistic-or-intentional-formulations-in-psychological-theories; the ascription of content to events and states in the mind. The fruits of that analysis are then exploited in Part III to provide answers to the most persistent quandaries about consciousness and its relation to the rest of the world. Part IV pushes tentatively, gropingly into the area I consider most important: the analysis of the relationship between our vision of ourselves and the world and the world as it is. The analysis of the relationship between our vision of ourselves and the world and the world as it is is the most important part of the book.
