

Leslie Martin:

1908–2000

The prominence and length of the obituaries that appeared last August in all of the United Kingdom's major national newspapers and professional journals were a testament to Leslie Martin's achievements and influence – and that from The Times is reproduced here. However, such inevitably compressed accounts invariably omit or only hint at some of their subject's most significant work. Those on Martin were no exception to this rule. Accordingly, we here present not so much an obituary as a celebration of this architect who did so much to create 'a coherent culture of research'.

The Times obituary is followed by contributions from three former Cambridge students: Lionel March, Richard MacCormac and Dean Hawkes. March, who collaborated with Leslie Martin on so much of his most influential research, reflects on this aspect of his work; MacCormac writes on Martin's buildings and the ideas behind them; and Hawkes considers his legacy to the indivisible trinity of education, practice and research.

John Meunier, himself a member of Martin's teaching staff at Cambridge, writes on his role as a model and mentor to the many staff and graduates of that period who went on to senior academic positions elsewhere.

Next, three architects who owed much to Leslie Martin's insight, support and inspiration write about this aspect of his work. Jørn Utzon recalls his support both before and after the saga of the Sydney Opera House; Manuel de Solà-Morales, the director of the urban research laboratory which provided the theoretical basis for Barcelona's resurgence, writes of his admiration for Martin's work; and Richard Rogers remembers Martin's effective support and energetic championing of his young practice.

Leslie Martin was in great demand as an advisor and consultant to other universities and organizations and acted for the Gulbenkian Foundation in Lisbon for many years. Mario Krüger, head of the architecture school at the University of Coimbra, writes about Martin's long-standing links with the Iberian peninsula, his work there and his support for architects in the difficult years of political dictatorship.

Next, Jeremy Lewison, writing about Circle, introduces us to yet another group of people whom Leslie Martin supported – artists and, in particular, Ben Nicholson. Circle, which only appeared once, had an influence far beyond the numbers actually sold.

The last word goes to a 'user' of one of Leslie Martin's buildings, the Royal Festival Hall, London. Bernard Levin's
