Autoimmunity to vimentin and lupus nephritis

SLE; lupus nephritis; Inflammation; B cells

Lupus nephritis affects up to 60% of adults and 80% of children with lupus. Despite vast improvements in the survival and well being of patients with this disease our current understanding of its pathogenesis is incomplete and the risk of end stage renal disease is still unacceptably high.

The glomerular lesions of lupus nephritis have been intensively studied over the last 5 decades, with the establishment and refinement of the ISN/RPS system for classifying the glomerular lesions as well as the development of composite indices of activity and chronicity. Classification of glomerular lesions in SLE was initially based on 5 year outcomes in patients who were untreated except for corticosteroids. Using patient survival as the outcome it was clear that patients with focal glomerular disease or membranous disease progressed slowly and had a much better outcome at 5 years than those with diffuse disease most of whom succumbed within 2 years. The validation of the current classification criteria and of activity and chronicity indices for determining treatment and predicting long-term (>5 year) outcomes in the current era of optimized immunologic and medical interventions is still a work in progress. This is in part because outcome is linked to demographic factors including age, gender and ethnicity as well as compliance, responsiveness to therapy and number of relapses; these currently cannot be predicted from an initial renal biopsy.

Compared with the emphasis on glomerular lesions in lupus biopsies, less attention has historically been paid to lesions of the renal tubulointerstitial compartment that include infiltrates with mononuclear cells, tubular atrophy, fibrosis and tubular immune complex deposition. Several previous studies found that tubulointerstitial lesions correlate with glomerular injury (1-2). A recent study from Clark's group did not however find a clear association between the magnitude of tubulointerstitial infiltrates and either activity index or glomerular histologic class but rather with the tubular components of the chronicity score that include tubular atrophy and fibrosis (3). In addition there is consensus that the presence of infiltrates does not correlate with the degree of interstitial immune complex deposition. It
