

RESEARCH DESIGN AND STATISTICS

DESIGN VS. STATS

Variables:

Operational definitions (concretely: accepted knowledge) clearly point to all operational units (in practice)

Categorical variables (qualitative variables) = variables that have at least two possible outcomes (in contrast to scale or interval variables that have infinity)

Quantitative variables (quantitative variables) = variables that represent numerical measurable quantity

Group characteristics: nominal (names that cannot form a meaningful sequence)

Ordering or measurement ("ordinal measurement") without statistics

Continuous variable: statistical subject that takes form a meaningful sequence and those values depend on the position of the measuring instrument used. These sequences ("sequences") become data points in the sense of ordered and grouped statistics

Scale & hierarchy

Primary data sources (direct measurement)

Secondary data sources: if there are two variables that have collected by means other (e.g. population) instead of with the respective instruments (e.g. surveys) provided to make conclusions

Other data sources (secondary sources) = so-called parameters

Example: a picture of a population without the subject

Other data sources (secondary sources) = so-called parameters

Class variables (e.g. gender) are not representing structures in a strict sense (e.g. measurement) because they are not quantitative but categorical and are structured (e.g. the following are structurally comparable) for some other reason (e.g. gender, categorical variables in forming the concept of the category)

Continuous variables (e.g. height) are not structured in the sense of the value

Ordering value = value that represents a hierarchical and therefore not available in the analysis

Ordered variables: represent an ordered value beyond simple

Ordinal variables: value representing a hierarchy (e.g. the following categories: small, medium, large) provide a structured value category

Continuous variables (e.g. height) are not structured in the sense of the value (e.g. height) but are not structured in the sense of the value (e.g. height) but are not structured in the sense of the value (e.g. height)

Types of sampling methods

Simple random sampling: the most common method for the population (the subject) that sample with the same probability (e.g. simple random sampling) as a representative sample

Systematic sampling: every the second individual (e.g. every second person) is selected

Cluster sampling: selection of the unit (e.g. group) as a representative sample

Stratified sampling: selection of the unit (e.g. group) as a representative sample
