

Early Production-Line Cars

By the end of the first decade of the 20th century it had become clear that the future of the automobile lay not only in mass production, but also in mass marketing. As the demand for mass-produced automobiles grew, manufacturers began to develop new ways of producing cars that could be sold in large quantities. This led to the development of the early production-line cars, which were designed to be built in large quantities and sold in large quantities.
