

INSTRUMENTATION HIGHLIGHTS AT ETW

ABSTRACT

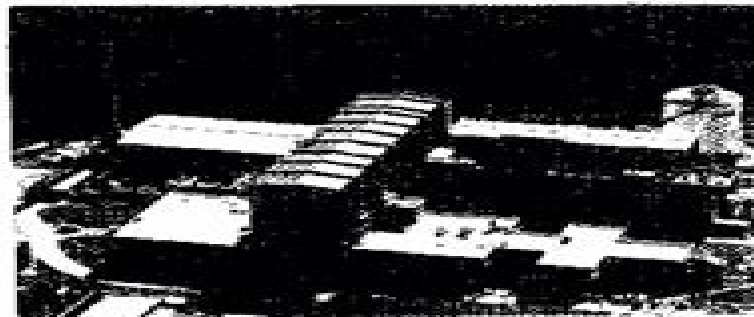

Deliberately avoiding explicit technical details, the paper describes several novel developments in the area of instrumentation. They were considered crucial for ETW, but are equally applicable to any other modern transonic windtunnel. These contributions to the state-of-the-art in windtunnel instrumentation relate to:

- Flow Reference Parameters
- Internal Strain Gage Balances
- Model Angle of Attack
- Multipoint Pressure Systems
- Balance Calibration Machine

The paper discusses on both the 'why' and 'how' and, where applicable, gives quantitative data.

INTRODUCTION

The European Transonic Windtunnel ETW (Fig. 1) is a closed circuit, continuous, cryogenic, transonic facility, currently (mid 1993) being commissioned and calibrated. It is located next to the Cologne-Bonn Airport, was officially inaugurated in June 1993 and is scheduled for actual model testing in 1994. Though built by four Western European nations - Germany, France, Great Britain and the Netherlands - it will be available to any customer requiring its unique capabilities. Its main design goals are high Reynolds numbers, high productivity and high accuracy. The combination of test section size (2 x 1.40m²), compressor power (50 MW), total pressure (1.5 bar) and total temperature (50 K) allows Reynolds numbers up to 50 million to be achieved for a typical full model. [1]

The large operating range necessitated new developments in the area of instrumentation to assure the performance expected by demanding customers. For this type of facility, primarily aimed at performing force and pressure tests on sting mounted models, the accuracy of a limited number of parameters or systems is decisive for meeting the data quality and productivity goals. In line with general ETW project guidelines, contracts for development and supply of these new systems were generally awarded after competitive tendering based on extensive ETW specifications, often stating the techniques and technology to be employed. A selection of these is presented in the following paragraphs.

FLOW REFERENCE PARAMETERS

The task of establishing primary flow conditions like M_∞ , Q and T_t is fundamental to any windtunnel. A complicating factor at ETW is that this data is also required as input to the automatic control system of the facility. The latter is crucial for ETW since it is next to impossible to operate the tunnel efficiently and accurately under manual control, due to the complex relations between setpoints and controlling parameters. So, apart from very tight requirements on absolute accuracy, there are also severe demands on speed of response and resolution. Listed in Table 1 are the accuracy requirements for the parameters of direct interest to the aerodynamicist.

	Accuracy	Range	Unit
M_∞	0.01	11 - 1.1
Q	1%	2 - 200	kPa
$Re_{ref} = 14751$	5%	-	10^6
T_t	0.2	50 - 70	deg. K

Accuracy of Aerodynamic Parameters
Table 1

None of these values can be measured directly, they all have to be derived from total pressure P_t , static pressure P_s and total temperature T_t . The error propagation when calculating M_∞ , Q etc. from these measurable quantities (or vice versa) is not very transparent, so a computer analysis was made for the operating envelope of ETW and for different transducer accuracies. For the low Mach number range two differential (P_t/P_s) transducers are required to assure sufficient accuracy, especially in Q . Assuming - optimistically - transducer accuracies of 0.01%, ranges, accuracy and resolution were defined as listed in Table 2.
