

Some chapters make enjoyable reading, in particular, those of Sinor himself, including one each on the Huns and the Türk empire, and Peter B. Golden's ones on the peoples of the Russian forest zone (although the forest zone of Siberia between the Urals and Lake Baikal seems to have got missed out), of the South Russian steppes and of the Transoxanian steppes. In the last of his three chapters, "The Karakhanids and early Islam" we have an excellent vue d'ensemble of the early history of Khurasan and Transoxania up to the eve of the Mongol invasions, including the appearance of the Qarakhanids and Oghuz, the latter of whom, under the leadership of the Seljuq family, were to transform the economy and society of the whole northern tier of the Islamic world. Samuel Szádeczky-Kardoss on the Avars, Colin Mackerras on the Uighurs and Herbert Franke on the forest peoples of Manchuria are equally stimulating. But where authors have gone for a narrowly-focused political and dynastic history, as in those on the Hsiung-nu and on early and mediaeval Tibet, the result is dreary: such accounts are for monographs specifically devoted to their subjects rather than for chapters aiming at a general assessment. Moreover, is Tibet, so intrinsically a part of the Buddhist cultural world and, geographically, as a vast mountain plateau, atypical of most of Central Eurasia, really a part of this last in the sense that Mongolia and Sinkiang obviously are (although the inclusion of a chapter on this region is of course the editor's responsibility)?

Everyone interested in this fascinating part of the world will need this book, and it is a pity that Cambridge University Press is not proceeding with what was originally planned as The Cambridge History of Central Asia; for a general work on Central Asia from Mongol times onwards, one must still refer to the trusty old warhorse of Grousset's L'Empire des steppes or to the volume edited by Gavin Hambly as Zentralasien/Central Asia. Two final points. There are five maps (at pp. 6, 29, 150, 286, 292, not listed in the Contents, hence only to be found by leafing through the actual pages), but a book dealing with such a vast area, with constantly-changing patterns of political and military domination, population movements, etc., cries out for more maps, e.g. for the identification of the archaeological sites mentioned in Chapter 3 on prehistory. The devoting of a chapter like this essentially to the evidence of archaeology leads on to the second point. Although various contributors, when discussing, e.g. the early peoples of Siberia, the Scythians and the Avars, mention their artifacts, usually brought to light by excavations, surely the whole topic of Central Eurasian art deserved a separate (and illustrated) chapter of its own, for the writing of which there are good specialists available. There is a continuity in this art which transcended the successive waves of ethnically-diverse peoples dominating the region, and the achievements of Central Eurasian metalworking form one of the few tangible legacies from the region of worldwide value and significance.

CENTRAL TIBET AND THE MONGOLS: THE YÜAN-SA-SKYA PERIOD OF TIBETAN HISTORY. By LUCIANO PETECH. (Serie Orientale Roma, Vol. LXV.) pp. vii, 167. Rome, Istituto Italiano per il Medio ed Estremo Oriente, 1990. L. 60,000.

Since the thirteenth century, the histories of Tibet and Mongolia have often converged. The two societies have frequently had religious, political, and economic relations, which influenced them both. Delineation and analysis of these relations, as well as of the Tibetans' and Mongols' links with China, have been impeded, in part, by twentieth-century political controversies. Tibetan nationalists have used history to prove that Tibet was independent in traditional times while the Chinese governments of the twentieth century have used historical records to claim that Tibet was part of China.
