Background: This study addresses the critical issue of high-volume emergency calls in hospitals, focusing on the strain caused by frequent caller patients on ambulance services. The aim was to synthesize various management methods for handling high-frequency hospital calls.

Methods: The systematic review was conducted following the Preferred Reporting Items for Systematic Review and Meta-analysis (PRISMA) guidelines and guided by the Cochrane Handbook for systematic reviews. Inclusion criteria encompassed studies focusing on the management of emergency departments in hospitals, exploring various medical conditions requiring ambulance attention, and reporting on the impact of a high volume of ambulance calls on hospitals. Databases including PubMed, Web of Science, and Google Scholar were searched from January 1, 2005, to May 1, 2022. The quality of included studies was assessed using the Critical Appraisal Skills Programme (CASP) Checklist.

Results: Out of 2390 identified citations, 18 studies met the inclusion criteria. These studies, from 12 countries, presented diverse methods categorized into country policy-based management, modeling approaches, and general strategies. Key findings included the effectiveness of risk stratification models and community-based interventions in managing high call frequencies and improving patient care. Our review identified effective strategies such as risk stratification models and community-based interventions, which have shown significant impacts in managing high call frequencies, aligning closely with our objective. These approaches have been pivotal in reducing the burden on emergency services and improving patient care.

Conclusions: The study synthesizes effective management methods for high-frequency ambulance calls, including predictive modeling and community interventions. It highlights the need for multi-faceted management strategies in different healthcare settings and underscores the importance of continued research and implementation of these methods to improve emergency service efficiency.

Keywords: systematic review, ambulance calls, emergency services

Introduction

The high volume of calls received by emergency ambulance services in standard or high-ranking hospitals is a matter of growing concern in healthcare systems worldwide. Emergency units and healthcare centers have grappled with the challenges posed by the incessant rise in the demand for emergency medical assistance. Despite implementing various strategies to manage this surge, the effectiveness of these measures has remained a critical issue. The impact of this crisis is exemplified by the alarming statistics reported by the Health and Social Care Information Centre, indicating an unsustainable increase in requests for emergency ambulance services.¹ For instance, in England, the number of emergency calls to ambulance dispatch centers more than doubled, soaring from 4.72 million in 2003 to 9.1 million in 2015.² The operational burden on healthcare systems, particularly on emergency services, has reached unprecedented levels.²
