

Anthropology and Nursing

Introduction

Anthropology is the study of humans and human behavior and societies in the past and present. Deals with the origins, physical and cultural development, biological characteristics, and social customs and beliefs of humankind. In summary anthropology is science of humans and their works.

Leininger argued that anthropology and nursing were "two worlds to blend". The difference lies in this: anthropology is solely an academic discipline — a structured approach to the search for knowledge; nursing, however, is both a discipline and a human services profession. As a discipline, the latter's objective is to build a science of nursing — a systematic and rigorous structure of enquiry regarding the health related aspects of human interaction with the environment. But as a profession, nursing is a highly practical and well defined service role for delivering care to patients

Thus, because most teaching in a school of nursing is to clinicians, anthropological understandings must be "translated" by the anthropologist so they are relevant to patient care. The challenge in this translation process lies not only in discovering how to make concrete, practical suggestions out of abstract concepts, but also how to introduce anthropology as a scientific discourse within which such concepts form part of a system of ideas, methods, data, and rather unique ways at looking at the world so that practicing nurses can routinely use anthropological understandings in a disciplined rigorous way as they engage in their professional duties.

Similarities Between Nursing and Anthropology

Much of anthropology has been concerned with shared beliefs, values, and behavior. Similarly, nursing practice addresses normal growth and development, wellness promotion and health education. During illness, the concern of nursing is in the client's behavioral response, and in enhancing modification of patterns of daily living to promote a return to a normal lifestyle.
